LET'S BLOW OUR OWN HORN

The Saturday Evening Post recently devoted a lead editorial to an interesting example of the inefficiency of capitalism. Fares for commercial plane flights across the Atlantic recently went up $25. The American airlines involved had been showing a profit on their overseas business, and they didn't want to raise the rate. However, the British and French lines, which are government-owned monopolies, had been taking heavy losses and they insisted on the boost. Inasmuch as the American systems' right to foreign nations rests on agreements which could be abrogated, there was nothing they could do but go along and charge the higher tariff.

Commenting on this, the Post suggests that American airline tickets carry a legend such as: "This ticket would cost $25 less if Socialism were working the way Socialists say it is." It then goes on to make this observation: "Never do these apostles of anti-free enterprise explain just when and where Socialist economies have delivered the goods. They content themselves with pointing out that a 'planned society' out to deliver the goods because of a planned society. What's the matter with asking for details of how they do it; and what's the matter with blowing our own horn, just softly, when we do it?"

This matter of the airplane fares isn't an isolated example. As soon as Britain's Labor government took over power industry rates were raised. Everyone knows of the doldrums her coal industry has been in. And even these businesses which are theoretically free in England are so bedeviled with red-tape, regulations, rationing schemes, and so on, that they are in a pitifully low state of efficiency.

News reports say that the Labor government seems to be slowing up in further nationalization of industry. Plans for taking over the iron and steel industries have been sidetracked by leaders. Perhaps some of the hard facts of life are coming home with impact to the socialists.

The countries which have gone whole hog, and fallen for the Communist line, are in far worse shape still. At present, their peoples—save for the ruling class, which never forsakes the luxuries—live on a subsistence basis.

In the meantime, the United States struggles along with much-abused free enterprise, and puts up with an unimproved standard of living, more individual freedom than any other nation has ever known, and a government which, in all its shortcomings, is unanswerable to the people.

WHAT FIRE INSURANCE CAN'T DO

The President of the National Board of Fire Underwriters has taken issue with the idea that the phenomenal increase in fire losses has been entirely due to inflation, and that "real losses" have been going down. According to him, the number of fires has increased, the number of deaths has increased, the number of conflagrations has increased, and the number of catastrophes has increased.

Fire insurance has cushioned the shock of fire for millions of people. But fire insurance, vital as it is, cannot perform miracles. It can pay us money if our property is up in smoke. But it cannot restore a human being who has been turned to death. It cannot recreate materials which have been turned to ashes. It cannot provide jobs for people who are thrown out of work when a factory turns into a pile of rubble. It cannot give us back keep-sakes and possessions whose extrinsic value far outweighs their intrinsic value. It cannot find homes for the homeless.

No one can prevent fire for us — no one else can keep a constant eye to see that our property is safe. That truth is the heart of the fire prevention problem.
